Preparing an Annotation

Dee, J., and Smith, A. "The erosion of the American Family," National Sociological Review, 80 (2), (1988): 111-175. Print.

The authors, researchers at BYU University, use data from the National Family Study Project to test their hypothesis that the erosion of the American family has at its base multiple causes that encompass diverse, poverty and the advancement of social media and other modern technology. Decreased time spent on computers indicates stronger family values and communication. In contrast, another study by Anderson cited below shows no differences in communication style.

The purpose of an annotation is to describe the cited material.

It should provide enough information about the book or article that a determination can be made as to whether the actual material should be examined.

Annotations can be any length, but usually are about 150 words in length, depending on the item.

Each annotation need not address all of the following concerns, but so far as possible, it should improve the decision making and simplify the researcher's work.

1. Author

- Who is the author?
- What is his/her occupation, position, education, experience, etc?
- Is the author qualified (or not) to write the article?

2. Purpose

- What is the purpose for writing the article or doing the research?

3. Intended Audience

- To what audience is the author writing?
- Is it intended for general public, for scholars, policy makers, teachers, professionals, practitioners, etc?
- Is this reflected in the author's style of writing or presentation? How so?

4. Author Bias
