2002

Hard to Define Home

Amber Young
Cedarville University

DigitalCommons@Cedarville provides a publication platform for fully open access journals, which means that all articles are available on the Internet to all users immediately upon publication. However, the opinions and sentiments expressed by the authors of articles published in our journals do not necessarily indicate the endorsement or reflect the views of DigitalCommons@Cedarville, the Centennial Library, or Cedarville University and its employees. The authors are solely responsible for the content of their work. Please address questions to dc@cedarville.edu.

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcommons.cedarville.edu/cedarvillereview/vol5/iss1/21
Hard to Define Home

Browse the contents of this issue of Cedarville Review.

Keywords
Poetry

Creative Commons License
This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Noncommercial-No Derivative Works 4.0 License.

About the Contributor (Optional)
Amber Young is a senior integrated language arts major. An attention-grubbing middle child, Amber writes because she always has more to say than anyone wants to hear.

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.cedarville.edu/cedarvillereview

Part of the Poetry Commons

This poetry is available in Cedarville Review: https://digitalcommons.cedarville.edu/cedarvillereview/vol5/iss1/21
Hard To Define Home
Amber Young

It is hard to define home without being away from it.
I would have guessed it all wrong.
Thought I'd miss my bed, my car, my cell phone.
But it is the shape of the driveway familiar feel of uneven bricks tilting under the arch of my foot, under the calloused parts and the toes.

Or going through the mulch, chunky pieces stuck for a temporary ride
till tree roots gently scrape them loose.
The imperfect grass, not totally soft,
not totally safe from doggie mines.

The single step down into the road.
Moment of compounded suspense:
reaching into the mailbox,
my hand and arm a postal spatula scraping the remains of advertisements, personal notes, and missing children cards from the deep back and sides of the white metal box.
To turn and see my home. Then-Fingers on the handle of the door.
I didn’t realize walking on a back street in small town Ohio could bring on a rush of past and present so exactly or so instantly.
Hard to Define Home

My life never flashes before my eyes in times of danger or dismay, but always when I am somewhere I have been before.
When this foot that I have traveled on for two decades touches crunchy leaves and kicks up the smell of sweet sawdust—so that I remember a gazillion other times I’ve touched and smelled.

How many autumns did we jump from the gray branches Soaring on renewed faith, wishing, really wanting the pile of leaves to be thick enough this time.
Same hard fall.
And after work, and warm armpits,
and maybe some blisters on our hands,
rough wood rubbing tender palms,
to blow our noses and always find the dark snot-
dependable black and brown of leaf particles suspended in goo.
Now I sniffle clear transparency.
Aiming to hold back from any late night emotional exhibits.
But wishing, really wanting to see you, and rake with you and feel the roots under my feet.

Amber Young