Till Human Voices Wake Us

Laura Davis
Cedarville University

DigitalCommons@Cedarville provides a publication platform for fully open access journals, which means that all articles are available on the Internet to all users immediately upon publication. However, the opinions and sentiments expressed by the authors of articles published in our journals do not necessarily indicate the endorsement or reflect the views of DigitalCommons@Cedarville, the Centennial Library, or Cedarville University and its employees. The authors are solely responsible for the content of their work. Please address questions to dc@cedarville.edu.

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://digitalcommons.cedarville.edu/cedarvillereview/vol8/iss1/5
Till Human Voices Wake Us

Browse the contents of this issue of Cedarville Review.

Keywords
Poetry

Creative Commons License

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Noncommercial-No Derivative Works 4.0 License.

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.cedarville.edu/cedarvillereview

Part of the Poetry Commons

This poetry is available in Cedarville Review: http://digitalcommons.cedarville.edu/cedarvillereview/vol8/iss1/5
For an etherized instant you—or whatever makes you you—slid silently out of your body and watched the circus milling in the room below from the darkness gathered in the corner of the wood-ribbed ceiling.

What was left of you stood pontificating loudly on some incredibly complex point of inquiry. The room was packed with potential art, draped all in black, shining behind thick dark-rimmed glass, demurely tied back in sleek brown ponytails, or spiky and wearing converse shoes.

Somewhere off in the corner the empty you heard a raspy whisper surrounded by tall, thin laughs, and cool amused glances flit aimlessly across the room to rest on your shoulder like pinned monarch butterflies.

The yellow lamplight echoed with high art as, bored with Michelangelo, you wished you were talking to someone else.

During a lull-in-conversation the nervous, faceless, aimless whisper slides up the wood-paneled wall, curling into the details like a thread of cigarette smoke, rising into the darkness—your companion in the corner of the ceiling.
As whatever makes you you sees stilly from the ceiling, your black sheik is only gaudy red and yellow satin.

Your prepared face, the white grease paint one, has curling, painted-on lips that smile up dumbly at the ceiling— you in such a beguiling way that you realize you can’t disown them—they already own you.

Of course, the room is full of painted faces; the curling red corners of mouths swirl and fill the room with pure red wool yarn that the tree lady hums over with a knowing click of knitting needles until she transforms it before your eyes into an exquisite red wool scarf.

And, as the room fills with red wool, you drown, wet with silence and stillness.

The tall laughs tickle like tiny wriggling wings and the smoky whisper is absorbed, leaving only a warm smell of burnt tobacco lingering around your neck as the real you—whatever that means—slips out into a luminous woody night.