Coffee Disconnects College Students from Mobile Devices

CEDARVILLE, OHIO — Cedarville University’s Student Life Programs office is working to change the perception that college students are glued to their phones, and it’s using discounted coffee to make it happen. Their new program, Coffee & Community, takes place on Tuesday nights from 7-10 p.m., in Rinnova, the campus coffee shop.

The idea originated five years ago as Brian Burns, director of student life programs (SLP), watched students interact more with technology than with their peers. Burns’ solution, Coffee & Community, is an easy way for students to come to a casual environment and experience true community.

Burns’ goals for the new program are threefold: build community on campus, create intentionality in conversation and encourage authentic relationship-building.

“I hope students stop and take the time to learn each other’s stories, think, debate and come back to truth,” he said.

Burns explained that this new program is intended to imitate God in His community. God has always existed in community between His three persons – Father, Son and Holy Spirit, he explained.

Brett Sumrall, director of campus community for Cedarville’s student government association, heads a team that will come up with the topics, which will include questions about important current issues like the upcoming election.

“We want to get at issues that we don’t talk about a lot but that we need to face, especially as a community of believers,” Sumrall said. “The goal is to foster casual conversations about intentional issues.”

Burns pointed out that what a university celebrates and focuses on shows what it values, so through this program, Cedarville wants to focus on community to show its value.
