Newsroom Will Take Cedarville University to National Audience

CEDARVILLE, OHIO – Developing greater awareness is a function of public relations. At Cedarville University, this includes finding new ways of telling stories of academic excellence and Christian mission through the media.

By Friday, Cedarville University will have a better opportunity to achieve this objective as it will officially open its first newsroom on campus. The facility, located in Centennial Library, will allow the university to connect its stories and professors’ expertise more easily with local and national media.

“Advancing Cedarville’s mission begins with building awareness,” said Dr. Janice Supplee, vice president for marketing and communications. “We’re excited about this newsroom because we believe it will help us expand our reputation as a distinctively Christian university with rigorous academic programs. It will also allow us to engage our culture by speaking into many of today’s current events from a Biblical perspective.”

The newsroom is the result of consistent growth in media exposure at Cedarville University. Since 2012, Cedarville has seen a 492 percent increase in media exposure (156 stories in 2012 to 924 in 2017). Also, 153 faculty and staff participated in interviews that resulted in a news story in 2016-17 compared to 49 in 2012.

Clearing, having faculty being willing to interview on cultural events has been central to this growth.

Dr. Mark Caleb Smith, director of the Center for Political Studies, participated in 295 media interviews in 2016-17, while his colleague, Dr. Glen Duerr, associate professor of international studies, did 105 interviews. Dr. Patrick Oliver, associate professor of criminal justice, and Dr. Marc Clauson, professor of history and law, each conducted 52 interviews during the same period.

And, now, with the newsroom, Cedarville is poised to increase that exposure as national media will have access to faculty experts on multiple topics.

“This newsroom is designed to help us tell our story more fully, and to a larger audience,” said Mark D. Weinstein, executive director of public relations. “Cedarville University has seen significant growth in exposure for its students, our academic programs, and ministries. Through this newsroom, I believe we will be able to communicate more news, and share more intentional content with media throughout the country.”

Developing the newsroom has taken months to assemble, but with a wide spectrum of support from many academic departments, it’s been a smooth process. Spearheaded by the department of communication and the marketing and communications division, the proper equipment was identified and purchased. Shawn Rifner, studio and technology manager for the communication department, and Mark Tucker, Cedarville’s videographer, collaborated before purchasing cameras, lights, editing suite and technology that allows any professor to go live with any TV station.

The newsroom will have two studio cameras, a green screen and other backdrops, studio lighting, a 14-channel recording mixer, a wireless microphone system and TVU ERA and LiveU 200E for streaming video. Cedarville is believed to be one of the first Christian colleges to have a newsroom for marketing and public relations purposes.

The newsroom will also be used as a learning laboratory for communication students and will allow Cedarville’s marketing team to share content that can help with student recruitment and retention.
